UNDERSTANDING

Caregivers

Taking care of others can be rewarding ... and stressful. Are you getting the support you need?

If you're a caregiver for a parent, child, spouse or another adult with a disease or disability, you're not alone. More than 60 million Americans provide full- or part-time unpaid care for family members with dementia, stroke, cancer, disabilities, mental illness and other special needs.

You stay busy with cooking, cleaning, laundry, toileting, bathing, medical care, running errands and driving to appointments.

In short, you're a doctor, nurse, taxi driver, housekeeper and psychologist all rolled into one.

A tough job

Being a caregiver can be a very positive experience that makes your life more fulfilling. It can also put a real strain on you. In addition to fulfillment, you may have feelings of anger, resentment, frustration, stress, exhaustion, failure, isolation or sadness.

Studies show that caregivers who are under a strain are more likely to have headaches, back problems, high blood pressure, high cholesterol and gain weight. It could compromise your immune system or even shorten your life. Caregivers may also battle stress, depression and substance use.

Steps for coping

You can take better care of others when you also take care of yourself, but you may find that's the hardest thing to do. It's important to:

- Get support. Consider joining a support group of other caregivers. You'll find validation, encouragement, friendship and help with problem-solving.
- Take a break. Put someone else in charge temporarily so you can walk away for awhile. This could be in-home respite care, an adult day care center or a short-term nursing home.
- Take care of yourself. Get enough sleep and find time for some physical activity every day. Also focus on eating healthy foods and drinking enough water.
- Stay in balance. Treat yourself to some alone time each day for prayer, meditation or other spiritual practices that give you inner strength.

- Accept help. Think about specific ways others can pitch in, whether it's bringing a meal, bathing, running errands or driving to an appointment. Then don't be shy about asking others for assistance.
- See your doctor. Stay up-to-date with screenings and immunizations. Be sure to tell your doctor that you're a caregiver and share any concerns or symptoms you have.
- Pat yourself on the back. Give yourself credit for doing the very best you can in a difficult situation.

Challenging circumstances

A variety of issues may put an extra strain on your situation. For example, caring for someone with dementia, a brain injury or at the end-of-life can be especially stressful.

Perhaps your relationship with the care recipient has always been difficult. You hoped this would be a time of healing, but now you only feel regret and discouragement.

Research shows that 40-70 percent of caregivers under strain show signs of depression that shouldn't be ignored. Symptoms include:

- Sleep problems
- Sadness
- Forgetfulness
- Pain that won't go away
- Fatigue
- Lack of interest in normal activities
